The security of undisbursed cash or cash-equivalents is of utmost concern. Funds shou be kept safe in a locked cabinet in an office securely locked at night.

Guidelines for Compensation to Research Participants

There are no hard and fast rutes out how much participants should or should not be paid. Participants should be paid enough to make up for their time and trouble, but not s much that their decision to volunteer or continue in a study is influenced by the amount being offered. Subjects hould not see research participation as a way to make a living or regularly supplement their income. Large payments can sugges the state of the state of the coercive.

Undue inducement is to be avoided. "Undue inducement" may be seen as inducement s high that were it not for the amount of the inducement, the participant would not enter th study, or the participant would withdraw from the study early, given his or her better judgment. Payment should not be entirely contingent upon the participant completi entire study, as that may be coercive. Rather, payment should be structured to accrue a the study progresses.

Payment types are limited to cashesearchers must collect Participant Receipts and must maintain a Participant Payment Ifogall research participants both the Research Participant Payment (RPP) Log and the Research Participant Receipt Form (RPR) payments to individuals for reasons of fiscal accountability, while maintaining confidentiality of the research participants.

These dcuments should be idenitial as confidential and will be processed in a prescribed manner ensuring na in apa

Anonymous Research

In limited circumstances where completely anonymous research participation is necessary, the following provision permits a modification/exception to the above documentation and reporting requirements. To qualify for this exception, the research investigator must have written approval/acknowledgement from the IRB and each anonymous research participant moust paid no more than $75. In this case the research
